I. Introduction

A recent Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals decision, Ramirez v. Brown, 852 F.3d 954 (9th Cir. 2017),¹ has provided an opportunity for certain people with Temporary Protected Status (TPS) to apply to adjust status (obtain a green card). This advisory aims to explain the benefits of the Ramirez decision, with examples to illustrate. The Ramirez decision is particularly helpful for TPS holders, such as Nicaraguans, whose TPS will expire due to a termination of the TPS designation. Please see Section IV(A) for a special note for Nicaraguans and others whose TPS designation will end. For many other TPS holders, the future of their TPS is uncertain. Thus, this advisory urges practitioners to consider taking action in all appropriate cases now, should the U.S. Supreme Court take up this issue and overturn this decision, or the current Administration change or end TPS.

Following the Ramirez decision, people who originally entered the United States without inspection and who were subsequently granted TPS may now be eligible for adjustment of status based on an immediate relative petition. The Sixth Circuit in 2013 reached a similar conclusion, that TPS is an “admission” for purposes of adjustment of status.² As this advisory will explain, people who qualify to apply for adjustment of status based on this decision should do so; people who do not currently qualify should consider Advance Parole.

A. Brief Background on Temporary Protected Status (TPS)

Temporary Protected Status, or TPS, is a form of temporary immigration relief available to people from specific countries that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) has designated are unsafe to return to, for example due to ongoing civil war or recent natural disaster. As of November 14, 2017, current countries with TPS designation are El Salvador, Haiti, Honduras, Nepal, Nicaragua, Somalia, Sudan, South Sudan, Syria, and Yemen.³ TPS designation is a discretionary determination that the government can end upon notice. If the government decides to terminate a country’s TPS designation, notice must be published no later than 60 days before the termination will take effect.⁴ Often, DHS gives more than the minimum 60 days’ notice. For example, DHS published notice in the Federal Register in September 2016 of its intent to terminate TPS for people from Guinea, Liberia, and Sierra Leone in May 2017;⁵ DHS published notice on October 11, 2017 of the termination of TPS.
designation for Sudan on November 2, 2018; and most recently, on November 6, 2017, DHS announced that TPS for people from Nicaragua will not be extended beyond January 5, 2019. The latest countries whose TPS designation are up for review are Haiti, El Salvador, and Honduras. Note that Honduras’s TPS designation was up for review in November of 2017, but because DHS was unable to make a determination, the TPS designation for Honduras was automatically extended for six months from the current January 5, 2018 date of expiration to the new expiration date of July 5, 2018, while DHS decides whether to renew TPS for Honduras on a more long-term basis.

In order to be granted TPS, applicants must undergo an extensive application process, including establishing admissibility under all applicable inadmissibility grounds. Once granted TPS, recipients must regularly re-register to maintain their TPS status for as long as the designation continues. As long as an individual has TPS, she is protected from removal, has authorization to work legally in the United States, and may request travel permission, called Advance Parole.

B. Brief Background on Adjustment of Status

Generally, in order for someone to be able to apply for permanent residency (a green card) through the Adjustment of Status process at INA § 245(a), she must have been “inspected and admitted or paroled” into the United States. She must also be admissible, and an immigrant visa must be immediately available. The requirement that someone be admitted or paroled has traditionally prevented many people who are otherwise eligible to adjust status—but who entered unlawfully and were never granted parole—from obtaining a green card.

“Admission” and “parole” have specific legal definitions in immigration law. “Parole” is when someone enters the country lawfully pursuant to a grant of parole, such as through Humanitarian Parole or Advance Parole. “Admission” has been interpreted to cover several different scenarios. In the most standard case, an “admission” for adjustment of status refers to when someone presents herself at a port of entry with valid immigration documents, and is formally admitted to the United States. Such documentation might be a valid nonimmigrant tourist visa (commonly referred to as a “visitor visa” or B-2 visa) or other visa, such as an H-1B visa. However, some other grants of nonimmigrant status in which the individual is already inside the United States, such as U nonimmigrant status, have also been held to be an “admission,” even though technically the person was already in the United States, rather than at a port of entry trying to gain admittance to the United States.

II. The Ramirez Decision

On March 31, 2017, the Ninth Circuit held that a grant of TPS is an “admission” as required for adjustment of status eligibility pursuant to INA § 245(a). Specifically, the Court analyzed the language at INA § 244(f)(4) governing TPS, which states that an individual granted TPS “shall be considered as being in, and maintaining, lawful status as a nonimmigrant” for purposes of “adjustment of status under section 1255 of this title.” It found that the plain language of the statute required “for purposes of adjustment of status under section 245" to mean all requirements under INA § 245, including having been “admitted or paroled.” Thus, the Court reasoned, a grant of TPS must constitute an “admission” for adjusting status.\textsuperscript{10}

The Sixth Circuit has also found that TPS is an “admission,” in \textit{Flores v. USCIS}, 718 F.3d 548 (6th Cir. 2013). For now, the Ninth and Sixth Circuits are the only two circuit courts of appeal that have held TPS to be an “admission.”\textsuperscript{11} As in the Sixth Circuit, people residing in the Ninth Circuit may now go forward and apply for adjustment of status if they have been granted TPS, are immediate relatives, and are otherwise admissible.

The Ninth and Sixth Circuit decisions both concerned individuals who were current TPS holders; there are strong legal arguments that the same reasoning should apply to individuals whose TPS has already expired. Nevertheless, there is no case on point, so practitioners should conservatively encourage TPS holders eligible to adjust to do so while they still have TPS.

Outside the Ninth and Sixth Circuits, the government continues to maintain that a grant of TPS is not an “admission” for purposes of adjustment of status. The Eleventh Circuit has upheld this view, in \textit{Serrano v. U.S. Attorney General}, 655 F.3d 1260 (11th Cir. 2011). In every circuit but the Ninth and Sixth, people with TPS who initially entered the United States unlawfully and have not been granted parole must depart the United States to obtain a green card through consular processing. Consular processing generally occurs at the U.S. consulate in the applicant’s home country—withstanding the fact that by virtue of having TPS, their home country has been deemed unsafe, justifying the TPS designation to begin with. Many people with TPS may also have prior removal orders or other complications preventing them from departing the United States to pursue consular processing.

\textbf{WARNING:} The \textit{Ramirez} decision does not change any of the adjustment of status requirements. Applicants for adjustment of status, even after this decision, must still meet all of the eligibility criteria, including the requirement that they are admissible (have no other, new inadmissibility issues), and if not immediate relatives, that they are not subject to the bars in INA § 245(c), such as the bar against adjustment for applicants who have accepted employment without authorization or who have failed to maintain lawful immigration status. The \textit{Ramirez} decision does not cure any grounds of inadmissibility. Rather, it clarifies that TPS holders within the Ninth Circuit meet the “inspected and admitted” requirement for adjusting status under INA § 245(a). For the most part, in order for someone to be granted TPS, the person has already shown that she is admissible, or has received a waiver for any applicable inadmissibility grounds. Regardless, however, the person will still have to show that she is eligible for adjustment of status and that she meets all of the requirements.
Example 1 – Prior to Ramirez Decision

Facts: Maria MADRE from El Salvador originally entered the United States without inspection in 1993. Maria lives in California and was subsequently granted TPS. Maria gave birth to her only U.S. citizen child, Dolores DAUGHTER, 22 years ago. Maria has never left the United States since her entry in 1993. Once Dolores turned 21, she submitted an I-130 petition for her mother that was approved soon after. Maria is unmarried, and her parents do not have lawful immigration status.

If she leaves to consular process, she will trigger the ten-year unlawful presence bar at INA § 212(a)(9)(B). This bar applies to noncitizens who (a) beginning on April 1, 1997, are unlawfully present in the United States for a continuous period of one year or more, (b) leave the United States voluntarily or by deportation/removal, and (c) then apply for admission to the United States. Anyone who triggers this bar is inadmissible for a period of ten years from the date of departure or removal.12 There is a discretionary waiver of the unlawful presence bar, available only to someone who can show extreme hardship to a U.S. citizen or lawful permanent resident spouse or parent.13

Maria has no citizen or lawful permanent resident parent or spouse upon whom she could base an extreme hardship waiver of the unlawful presence bar. Thus, if she were to depart the United States to consular process, she would trigger the bar and be ineligible for a waiver. Knowing this, her attorney has warned her not to leave the country. She is stuck at the approved I-130 stage, and cannot go forward with an adjustment application.

Analysis: Prior to the Ramirez decision, Maria would not have been able to immigrate through her 22-year-old U.S. citizen daughter because Maria was not able to adjust her status. She entered the United States without inspection and was never granted parole. She therefore did not have the requisite lawful admission or parole. Maria could only immigrate through consular processing at the U.S. Consulate in San Salvador. In practice, Maria was not able to immigrate through consular processing either, because as soon as she left the United States, she would have been subject to the ten-year unlawful presence bar of INA § 212(a)(9)(B). She would not qualify for the waiver because she does not have a U.S. citizen or permanent resident spouse or parent.

Example 2 – After the Ramirez Decision

Facts: Same facts as in EXAMPLE 1 above.

Analysis: After the Ramirez decision, Maria is able to immigrate through her U.S. citizen daughter because Maria will be able to adjust her status. Although she originally entered the United States without inspection, and has never been granted parole, her grant of TPS constitutes the requisite lawful “admission.” She is also not subject to the ten-year unlawful presence bar at INA § 212(a)(9)(B), because it is only triggered upon a departure from the United States. She has never left the United States, and she will not have to leave the United States to consular process since she will be able to adjust her status here.
III. Advance Parole as an Alternative Option

The Ramirez decision expands the number of TPS holders who will qualify for adjustment of status based on being “admitted,” as the Court clarified that a grant of TPS constitutes an “admission” for this purpose. Another way to qualify for adjustment of status, as mentioned in Section I(B) above, is through being “paroled” into the United States. Parole remains an option for TPS holders, and is particularly important for TPS holders outside of the Ninth and Sixth Circuits. Advance Parole is permission to re-enter the country within a set period of time and is granted before someone departs the United States. Advance Parole allows the person to have a lawful means of returning to the country after a brief trip abroad. The standard for obtaining Advance Parole is provided by statute for TPS holders, and the standard is especially generous.

WARNING: The law and policy regarding Advance Parole could change at any time. Moreover, leaving on Advance Parole can be risky for someone with prior immigration and criminal violations. Thus, anyone considering leaving the country with Advance Parole should consult with a trusted immigration attorney before pursuing this alternative. Further, if an individual is presently eligible to adjust under Ramirez, she should do so. Travel on advance parole is not legally necessary in the Ninth and Sixth Circuits for a TPS holder who entered unlawfully to adjust as long as Ramirez (and Flores) remain good law. We discuss Advance Parole to suggest an alternative that may be available to some people, at the time of writing this advisory, who do not live within the Ninth or Sixth Circuits, or who are not immediate relatives and cannot currently adjust, notwithstanding Ramirez. Practitioners should make sure their clients fully understand and evaluate any risks of leaving the country before pursuing Advance Parole.

Advance Parole may be most helpful in providing or preserving an opportunity to adjust status in the future for current TPS recipients who:

1) Live outside of the Ninth and Sixth Circuits; and/or
2) Will lose TPS soon, such as due to the termination of their country’s designation; and/or
3) Do not currently have an immediate relative through whom they can adjust status, such as those who are:
   a. married to a lawful permanent resident who may later become a U.S. citizen;
   b. unmarried, but may later marry a spouse who is or becomes a U.S. citizen; or
   c. the parent of a U.S. citizen child who is not yet old enough to petition for them.

Example 3 – Advance Parole as an Alternative

Facts: Maria MADRE from El Salvador originally entered the United States without inspection in 1998. Maria lives in Arizona and has never left the country since she entered. She was granted TPS. Maria gave birth to her only U.S. citizen child, Dolores DAUGHTER, 15 years ago. Maria is unmarried, and her parents do not have lawful immigration status. If Maria left to consular process, she would trigger... the ten-year unlawful presence bar under INA § 212(a)(9)(B). Maria has no U.S. citizen or lawful permanent resident parent or spouse upon whom she could base an extreme hardship waiver of the INA § 212(a)(9)(B) unlawful presence bar, and thus she would be stuck outside of the country for ten years if she tried to consular process.

Analysis: The practitioner screens and finds no problems in terms of Maria’s eligibility for Advance Parole as a current TPS recipient, nor any possible “red flags” (such as prior criminal or immigration violations) that could result in DHS barring her re-entry into the United States with Advance Parole. Additionally, the practitioner fully explains the risks to Maria of traveling on Advance Parole, and makes an assessment of the current status of TPS, Advance Parole, and the law underpinning the ability to reenter on Advance Parole and subsequently apply for adjustment of status. The practitioner explains to Maria that under current law, Maria’s grant of TPS constitutes an “admission” under Ramirez; Arizona is within the Ninth Circuit, and therefore the Ramirez decision applies to her case. The practitioner explains that there is also another way to meet the INA § 245(a) “admitted or paroled” requirement, by traveling abroad and returning to the United States with Advance Parole. Maria may decide that she wants to travel on Advance Parole, so that she will be eligible to apply for adjustment of status as soon as her U.S. citizen daughter turns 21 and is able to submit a petition on Maria’s behalf—even if Ramirez is later overturned, or her TPS ends and Ramirez is construed only to apply to current TPS holders. Note that as long as Ramirez and Flores remain good law, and TPS for El Salvador persists, Maria does not legally need to take this additional step of traveling on Advance Parole. The aim of Advance Parole in this case is to offer Maria the strongest possibility of being able to adjust her status in six years (when her daughter turns 21) even if:

1) the designation of TPS for which she has qualified has ended and the DHS or a court determines that the Ramirez decision no longer applies to individuals whose TPS grant has ended or lapsed; or
2) the U.S. Supreme Court overturns the Ramirez decision in the future.

IV. Next Steps: Pursue Adjustment if Eligible, or if not Eligible, Consider Advance Parole

Adjustment Pursuant to Ramirez: It is unclear whether the current administration will renew the TPS designations for El Salvador, Honduras, and Haiti in 2018, and we already know that Sudan’s and Nicaragua’s TPS designations will not be extended beyond November 2018 and January 2019, respectively. Therefore, we strongly advise TPS holders who are from those countries and are eligible for adjustment pursuant to Ramirez to do so soon.

Adjusting soon, if eligible, protects a TPS holder in three ways. First, it provides a TPS holder with a more secure immigration status—and protects the person if TPS is ended. Whereas TPS is by definition temporary, a green card allows someone to live and work permanently in the United States. Second, given the current circuit split on whether a TPS grant is an “admission,” the issue could go before the Supreme Court, and Ramirez could be overturned. Third, there is also a possibility that DHS or a subsequent court decision will narrowly construe the Ramirez holding as permitting the adjustment only of someone who currently has TPS. In this scenario, if TPS ends (and even if Ramirez continues to be good law), the person might not be allowed to adjust status if she were no longer in valid TPS status.

Traveling Pursuant to Advance Parole: A person with TPS will NOT be able to travel pursuant to Advance Parole based on TPS if the TPS designation has ended. However, they are able to apply for and travel based on TPS Advance Parole up until the end of the TPS designation. If individuals are unable to currently avail themselves of the Ramirez decision, as illustrated in Example 3 above, some practitioners might consider submitting TPS-based Advance Parole applications as soon as possible so that their clients are able to travel and return prior to the termination date of their country’s TPS designation. To see expiration dates for current TPS designations, go to www.uscis.gov/humanitarian/temporaryprotectedstatus#Countries%20Currently%20Designated%20for%20TPS. Practitioners should also recommend that their clients apply for Advance Parole sooner rather than later because USCIS processing times for regular (non-emergency) Advance Parole applications have been slowing down. As noted above, the law and policy surrounding Advance Parole may also change, so it is critical that the practitioner and client carefully consider any risks of traveling on Advance Parole.

A. Special Note for Nicaraguans and Others Whose TPS Will End

The advice in this advisory is particularly important for individuals who currently have TPS for Nicaragua, Sudan, or other countries whose designation has terminated. Before their TPS expires, TPS holders from these countries should either apply for adjustment of status if eligible and residing within the Ninth or Sixth Circuits (Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Kentucky, Michigan, Montana, Nevada, Ohio, Oregon, Tennessee, or Washington), or travel with Advance Parole based on TPS. Even if adjustment of status does not appear to be an option, we urge individuals with TPS from Nicaragua and other countries whose TPS is ending to travel with Advance Parole while still able to do so, to ensure that in the future when TPS Advance Parole is no longer an option for them (once the TPS designation expires), and even if the decisions in the Ninth and Sixth Circuits are overturned, they may be eligible to adjust status.

We encourage people with TPS from Honduras, and other countries whose TPS is up for review, to take similar action as those from Nicaragua in case their TPS designation is ended.

PRACTICE TIP: Unlike when DHS announced the end of Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) on September 5, 2017, and immediately stopped accepting DACA Advance Parole applications, TPS holders may continue to submit applications for Advance Parole (Form I-131) until their TPS expires. This means that TPS holders from Nicaragua and other countries whose TPS designation is ending can currently still apply for Advance Parole while they have TPS.
Further, the requirements for TPS Advance Parole are far easier than the requirements for DACA Advance Parole.\(^\text{18}\) Whereas DACA Advance Parole was only authorized for certain limited purposes, federal regulations permit TPS Advance Parole more generally. Any legitimate personal or business reason for travel should be sufficient for TPS Advance Parole.

End Notes

\(^1\) The decision is available on the Ninth Circuit’s website, at https://cdn.ca9.uscourts.gov/datastore/opinions/2017/03/31/14-35633.pdf.

\(^2\) Flores v. USCIS, 718 F.3d 548 (6th Cir. 2013).

\(^3\) USCIS, Temporary Protected Status (last visited Nov. 9, 2017), available at www.uscis.gov/humanitarian/temporary-protected-status#Countries%20Currently%20Designated%20for%20TPS. As this list is continually changing, please check the USCIS website for updates. On November 6, 2017 DHS announced that it would be ending the designation of Nicaragua after extending protection to Nicaraguans one final time, until January 5, 2019.

\(^7\) See https://www.uscis.gov/humanitarian/temporary-protected-status/temporary-protected-status-designated-country-nicaragua.

\(^8\) For more information, see www.uscis.gov/humanitarian/temporary-protected-status.

\(^10\) Ramirez v. Brown, 852 F.3d 954, 958-959 (9th Cir. 2017).

\(^12\) INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(v).

\(^13\) INA § 244(f)(3).

\(^14\) 8 CFR § 244.15. The regulations allow for travel and do not specify any required reasons except that it be approved within the parameters of Advance Parole. Note that all parole is authorized pursuant to INA § 212(d)(5), which authorizes parole for humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit. In practice, TPS holders will be authorized to travel for any stated personal reason or business purpose. For more information on parole, see the ILRC’s manual, Parole in Immigration law, available at https://www.ilrc.org/publications/parole-immigration-law.

\(^16\) TPS for Honduras has been temporarily extended to July 5, 2018 while DHS makes a final decision whether to renew TPS for Honduras further. Current TPS designations for Haiti expire on January 22, 2018 and El Salvador on March 9, 2018. Therefore, DHS must announce by November 22, 2017 whether it will continue TPS for Haiti, and by January 9, 2018 for El Salvador.

\(^17\) See 8 CFR § 244.15. The regulations allow for travel for TPS holders and do not specify any required reasons except that it be approved within the parameters of Advance Parole. All parole is authorized pursuant to INA § 212(d)(5), which authorizes parole for humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit. In practice, TPS holders will be authorized to travel pursuant to TPS Advance Parole for any stated personal reason or business purpose. In contrast, DACA Advance Parole was only for limited purposes such as visiting an ill family member, study abroad, or certain employment purposes.
About the Immigrant Legal Resource Center

The Immigrant Legal Resource Center (ILRC) works with immigrants, community organizations, legal professionals, law enforcement, and policy makers to build a democratic society that values diversity and the rights of all people. Through community education programs, legal training and technical assistance, and policy development and advocacy, the ILRC’s mission is to protect and defend the fundamental rights of immigrant families and communities.